We often hear the phrase, "If you cannot say something nice, say nothing at all." In business and life, we sometimes lose our temper or cool when faced with others who are rude or insensitive. However, in reality, there is nothing that is "bad" about responding with an aggressive comment. Being able to develop the art of not taking something personally is a valuable skill that can be applied in everyday life to help develop a personal network of influence, and when used correctly, it can help diffuse an awkward or uncomfortable situation. This is where the art of non-verbal communication is so important. We often overlook how we say things out loud, so much so that we can end up saying more than we intend. We may even respond to something that is said that we really don't agree with or want to say out loud. The point is, sometimes we get so caught up in the message and the reaction of our words that we lose track of what we are trying to say, and what others are actually hearing from us. We can easily find ourselves reacting to something, or someone, that we are not prepared to respond to. Non-verbal communication is often overlooked by both individuals and corporations. This leads to a poor impression being left on the person we are communicating with, and it can even cause the person to lose interest in what we are trying to say. So, how do we improve this skill? The first thing to remember is that it is impossible to control what we say and what we don't say. The best that we can do is to manage what we say, and at the same time, control how it is perceived by the people we are communicating with. This will allow us to engage and interact with the other person on the level that we intend to. It is important to learn how to modulate the volume of our voice. This allows us to be able to understand exactly what is being said to us when we have to speak in a crowded setting. We can also make sure that the other person is able to hear us clearly when we are talking to them. The rule here is to speak louder when speaking to a group of people, and speak quieter when communicating with one person. We can also use body language to communicate with others. This is the best way to show others that we are not offended by what they have said or done. It is easy to unintentionally display a negative attitude by what we do or don't do. This is why we should make sure that our posture is one that conveys an air of confidence. We can also use our gaze to help us communicate with others. We should also make sure that our facial expressions reflect what we are trying to communicate. The point is, we need to be aware of what we are saying, and not just what we are saying out loud. We need to also understand the people that we are
