Tipping In: Union Busting Doesn't Help the New England Post Office By Kris Maher Nov. 12, 2011 3:12 p.m. ET While the letters pouring in to Postmaster General Patrick Donahoe were still coming in, his predecessor, Stephen M. Cutler, offered a New England Post employee $10,000 to leave the service. "He did that, and that's a big deal when you are a postal worker," said Ms. Connolly of the Greenfield, Mass., carrier who was interviewed by The Wall Street Journal. Patrick R. Donahoe, the outgoing Postmaster General, also used his tenure to embark on a number of actions to dismantle the postal union and possibly undermine its bargaining power with Congress. Mr. Donahoe was named to the post by President Barack Obama in April and took over in late July. While Mr. Cutler's tenure was tainted by allegations of "witch hunt" and "political malpractice," Mr. Donahoe has drawn fire for a number of actions during his tenure. Earlier this year, Mr. Donahoe called a Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service mediator to talk to Postal Service employees after a contract proposal was rejected by the union.

"Achieving the benefits of postal reform with a proven track record of success is essential to the future of the Postal Service," he said. He won praise from some colleagues who said that an overhaul of the Postal Service was needed. He earned the displeasure of unions, by ending secret ballot elections, in which workers vote to form a union. He angered employees and congressional Democrats, who said the Post Office was undermining democracy. Finally, he angered Republicans who say his policies allowed too much intervention by the Post Office in health care and threatened smaller providers.

"Donahoe has done a good job of filling the shoes of his predecessor," said Ed Boyle, president of
