A more positive take on emerging art markets, illustrated by some research from Reuters There are a number of low-cost trading platforms that incorporate artworks into a security. However, while art traders may be motivated to trade, it is unlikely that many art collectors would want to trade their investment for short-term gains. In addition, it may be the case that some artworks are far more attractive to investors than others. Artworks are not traded directly in the same way as stocks or currencies, so there are no direct accounting rules. However, the international art market is not a black box in the same way as global stock markets, so it is likely that more transparency is required for investors. "It is not the case that the art market always moves in step with the stock market. Artworks that sell at high prices tend to stay at high prices" - Daniel M. Singer, head of art and estate strategy at Raymond James While we may not know
