McLellan suggested a new branding and strategy that would separate the Photoshop brand from the brand of other products in the Adobe family. The two carefully devised the new mark, using a photo of a dying baby elephant by photographer David Redfern. The new mark was simple and elegant, representing the rebirth of the program and the start of a new era in the family's marketing and branding. Elements was chosen as the name because it played on the idea that Photoshop was going to be like new and improved, but better than ever. Elements was also the better name because it already had a meaning. EtymologyWeb.com credits a quote from William Shakespeare as the first known usage of _elements_. "Let the end speak, and everything's done." — _Hamlet_ act 2, scene 2. We can only imagine that Adobe designers chose the name Elements because the mark had a strong enough meaning to use it for Photoshop elements. Elements is a clever branding, but it almost misses the mark on whether we need more than one program in the Adobe family. Maybe it's just us that is getting left out by the name. * * * # Edge Animate Adobe Edge Animate CS6 is a new cartoon creation program for the web and mobile platforms. Q: Linking to the Chrome OS Stable Channel Downloads page using HTML, CSS, and JavaScript? On the Google Product forums, if I'm reading correctly, the latest stable version of Chrome for Google Chromebooks is available as of this post. But I'm not seeing anything on Chrome.com to download that version. I don't understand why Chrome's Downloads page isn't updated to point to the latest stable build. If this is something that should be updated by an HTML, CSS, and JavaScript function, how would I go about doing this? A: The following URL is supposed to redirect to the download page: chrome://downloads It doesn't redirect for me, but it does cause the download page to load fine: I suspect that the servers which serve Chrome's downloads are updating their redirects, but I've noticed several things during this time: Google usually only updates the , the , and the ; I suspect these redirects are in the code somewhere, and Google is just updating them now. Website load times are bad. I suspect that page contents may be cached on the user's browser, causing it to wait until the cache has been updated before it loads. More information would be nice about why this is happening in Google's download pages. So often, we can't hear what we really want to hear. Trump supporters are often so wrapped up in the narcissism of billionaire boys' clubs like Trump's, they can't see how their man-child-in-chief is destroying America. They've had enough of politicians who see them as pawns to get elected, and puppets to keep their position at the head of the line. They can't see the American Dream and the sacrifices of history being erased. They can't see that their lives and liberty are in danger. Their feelings of isolation and cultural shame are being ripped off the screen of their computers. So we go on. We keep voting for politicians who don't care about you, because we don't care about you either. We show up for the politicians who will stop the rape and pillage
