Inferno is primarily written in C++, and it can be ported to other languages with a custom build of the compiler for each language. Inferno is also portable, that is, it can be run on any platform with a supported compiler. What's hot Keywords your kitchen What's new Change log 3D modeling and 3D animation is becoming easier and easier with the increase of availability and decrease of price of 3D modelling software. Still these tools have two major drawbacks: they are not open source, and they don't allow export of the project to real world. That doesn't mean you can't or shouldn't model in these softwares, since you can make really great looking models even with just blender. But they are great for learning and I recommend them for anyone looking for a quick way to create some models for the games or other products you're working on. The 3D studio release is still not complete, but it is now in a good shape. What has changed the most is the ability to export and compress textures in the normal map format (a.k.a..TGA files) and the support for a more stable version of OpenTK. The rendering engine, which is the most important part of the application, is stable enough to be used directly. One must still remember that the renderer is still in development. There are bugs, but you can already render in 3D by just editing a text file (after which a window appears allowing you to choose the actual view and rendering mode). The nice thing about rendering with Infinity in 3D is that you can make 2D pictures in real time, giving you that fast time feedback you don't get with the other 3D modelling softwares. This release is not 100% done yet and has some rendering problems. Still, it's a very promising

Is there a CSS property I can use to make it so that a table row grows wider so that its content is displayed properly? Here is my fiddle: For example, the bottom rows in the table can be seen in a wider space in the browser, and they are probably not being laid out by themselves as I would like. A: Yes, there's word-wrap: break-word; UPDATE: A second solution, if you're okay with some work on the structure, can be done using a table-layout: fixed; In this example, I'm using colspan=2 but it can be applied to every row, even if they have only one cell.
