(Photo by Kristopher Shorridge/Getty Images) Google, Apple, the White House and Twitter have all been criticized for being "silent" about gun control during the 2013 Aurora theater shooting. [RELATED: 'Silent Majority' offers $10,000 reward for info on Aurora theater shooting] Though Google took an official stance on gun control last November when it removed a National Rifle Association app from its Chrome Web Store, it has been accused of giving tacit approval to the NRA by not speaking up more about gun control. "It doesn't matter if you're a Google or an Apple, an Uber, an Amazon," The White House said in response to Google's removal of the NRA app last year, "all these companies are part of a public commons, and they don't get to cherry pick whose viewpoints they embrace." Similarly, Jack Dorsey, co-founder of Twitter, has been criticized for not speaking up against the NRA. "We see this as how can we hold ourselves to a higher standard than other companies that are not, to be very clear about it, helping to advance the narrative of how we need to have expanded access to guns in this country," Dorsey said in 2013 in a revealing interview. While the White House and Dorsey remain silent on gun control, Twitter has been more outspoken when it comes to gun control, beginning in 2013. "Twitter won't be giving you the same free pass that it did previously," White House spokesman Eric Schultz told CBS News in 2013. Since the 2013 shooting, Twitter has also been more vocal about gun violence, tweeting about the need for legislation in the wake of the shooting. In addition to Twitter and Google, the White House and Apple have also faced criticism for being silent on gun control. "Apple and Google could start by reconsidering their decision to be an arm of the NRA...they may not have liked the idea, but they're deeply enmeshed in the business of selling guns and lobbying to protect their profits," comments Michael McAuliff, director of education for the Center for American Progress Action Fund.
