The fact that the savings and loan was not taxed at the time the property was transferred to it by complainant does not indicate that the property was retained by the Bank for other than a legitimate purpose, or that the property was wrongfully transferred. It is a necessary consequence of the banking laws of the state that savings and loans have the power to invest their funds, subject to the limitations of the statute (R.S. *479 § 5201 et seq.), and this is not a wrongful purpose. The fact that respondent did not know who made the transfer is immaterial. The fact that no transfer deed was executed does not indicate that the transaction was not valid. It is common knowledge that when a husband makes a deposit in the name of his wife, the proceeds are payable to her, and when a corporation makes a deposit in its own name it is payable to the person who has control of the money. A bank does not inquire into the ownership of a fund which it has in its custody for safekeeping, for the bank has a common law duty to honor checks payable to the depositor. Nor is there anything in the record to indicate that respondent was not competent to enter
