Thinka daisies, and rosehip fruits I saw a stage whisper now and again amongst masses of people, repeated peering of groups of friends and acquaintances. “That’s like something I’d do....” “That’s like something my friend would say....” “That’s like something that guy would say.” It’s a wonderful thing to imagine yourself in the minds of others. They see what you see, and they tell you their ideas about it. And so it gives you a chance to think about your own ideas about your audience and about how you want them to see you.
Sometimes it’s also good to step back and think about how those other people might be thinking about you. And then you can look for examples of how that person/group might be seeing your ideas. Do they see the same things as you? What? Do they get a contradictory message from you? What is it? We often get caught up in the rush of the day and working without thinking about how the people we are interacting with might be thinking about us. My friend, Matt, and I used to have a good laugh over how we sometimes got caught in that trap. We had these big ideas. We had this vision. And then in the moment of pushing it out as fast as we could, we didn't take the time to think, "wait a minute. Do they see that? Does that get in the way?" The answer, for both of us, was often yes. So we had to take time to think more about what they might have seen, and to take it out when it's a better fit. This is why, in my work, I try to find ways to show my audience how I see them. I try to show what I see of myself in them. For example, I love chocolate. I'll admit it. I like it a lot. It's just one of those things. But it's one of those things that I see in them, which I have a funny way of showing. On the stage, I throw all the chocolate up in the air and gesture wildly for the audience to follow me into my arms. At the most recent performance, I held up two tickets for a show I'm performing in, and I'm
