Traditionally, ink compositions have been dried with hot air. However, it is clear that this is not a desired situation because of the time and energy that is required and the danger of fire. Conventional drying processes also require a significant amount of time to dry the ink, especially for large prints, and are not capable of providing very high print speeds. Ink drying processes have been developed which use volatile solvents to form a dried ink which is dry immediately after application to a substrate. The drying of ink compositions is essential for good quality prints, but unfortunately this drying process causes great problems if the substrate is porous. The drying process can cause the ink composition to penetrate into the pores of the substrate, causing the substrate to swell and in some instances blistering. Pre-crosslinked aqueous dispersions have been developed in order to overcome the penetration problem. However, pre-crosslinked dispersions cannot be used in printers where the deposited ink is cured using heat. Furthermore, when the dispersions are pre-crosslinked the solids content of the inks is lowered, resulting in higher viscosity and higher cure temperature, which reduces the performance of the inks. Therefore, it is desirable to have an ink which is dry immediately after application to a substrate, which does not penetrate into the pores of a porous substrate, and which can be cured by heating in printers, which has a low viscosity, and which does not contain pre-crosslinked dispersions. Cicero's Density Theorem—From Baroque to Postmodern Cicero's Density Theorem, or the "law of the spoon" as it's often called, states that, for any density function $d(x)$, there exists an $x_i > x$ such that a value of $d(x_i)$ is equal to the value of $d(x)$ at all values of x up to x_i (i.e., up to x , the threshold, the value of the density function). Let's look at a concrete example. If the density function is bounded by zero and one
