In the Battle of Endor, the Rebel forces used a few larger gunships: the A-wing, B-wing and X-wing - and later the Y-wing. The Imperial forces had the AT-RT and the X-wing (the 'classic' X-wing in that version is heavier than the new X-wing, but lighter than a Y-wing, so feels very different when flying) - in addition, the speeder bikes were used to deflect laser fire. This is the point where I'm curious. Before the Rebels arrived, the Empire had no need for speeder bikes, so why did it use those? Likewise, why did it use the X-wing and not the A-wing or B-wing? As an interesting aside: I was told that the Imperial blaster cannons on the A-wing were not as powerful as the Rebels used in the Battle of Hoth, though this might have been before the Rebellion, too, so I'm not sure what the sources for that are. A: This is true, the Empire was not as popular as the Rebels, the Resistance had been fighting them for years,

When sending messages over a socket, is it better to specify the amount of data read from the socket with read, or the amount of data to write with write? For example, I have a server that receives a message, and this message is divided up into packets. Each packet has information about it; for example, what the packet is, how long it takes, etc. So, when the packet comes in, I split it into different packets and I send them over a socket. I have two ways of doing it. Here is the first: In my packet sender, I write the information of the packet. Then, I have the information of when this packet will be sent, and when this packet is sent, the packet is sent. However, if I try to write the packet, and write the information of the packet, it won't send the packet because the packet has not been sent yet. I have to split up the packet information and only write it when the packet is being sent. Or does this not matter? And here is the second way that I do it: In my packet sender, I put the information of the packet. Then, I have information on when the packet will be sent, and when the packet is sent, it will be sent.
