What's new in Elden Ring:

>Sticky Sherman, the oldest living member of the NFL and the New York Giants, said Wednesday he only came to work this season because the Giants paid him "to be there." "That's about all I'm here for right now," Sherman told "Inside the NFL." "I mean, I can't be here to make the team go anywhere." Those comments came in answer to a question about why the 52-year-old played at all. Sherman hasn't taken the field since the Giants' July 27 preseason game against the Cincinnati Bengals, but he called himself "the only one" who takes the field at all of the Giants' workouts. "I couldn't take enough anger out of that game for that locker room to start to cuss me out for being the oldest guy on this team and playing on this team," Sherman said. "F--- you!" The Giants have had no announcements about Sherman's status for the next game. CBS Sports Network analyst Seth Wickersham reported Wednesday that Sherman would be back this week in practice. He's a veteran on a team that is mostly made up of unproven players. His job is to coach those players and, in many cases, act as a mentor. The Giants have often leaned on players like Sherman because of the NFL's salary cap. The team was forced to make considerable salary cuts this past offseason, and that also forced the Giants to keep older, more experienced players around in case those younger players struggle to develop. Don't count on Sherman as a starter, but he has a job for the remainder of the season. Other teams have attempted to move Sherman off the field so younger players could stand out with practice time. That hasn't happened in New York. Sherman was disappointed about not making the team as a linebacker, because he felt this was his best position. He wanted to play in the same scheme as special teams coordinator Tom Quinn, who moved to linebacker for the Giants' 2012 playoff run. Sherman spent eight years with the San Francisco 49ers before spending a season in 2013 and 2014 with the Seattle Seahawks. He was traded back to the 49ers in 2015 and retired following that season. Sherman spent the Giants' Week 3 bye week in Michigan with his family. A number of techniques have
