For those not keeping up with the industry jargon, FIFA is a series of football video games developed and published by EA Sports. It has had a reputation for not only having some of the best-looking football games but also for its gameplay. In years past FIFA games have gotten close to the feeling of real football and been quite simply, excellent. EA has been working towards bringing the FIFA experience to life on both PlayStation 4 and Xbox One. A year after the release of FIFA 18, the series has evolved from a run-of-the-mill football game into a title that pushes the boundaries of technology to bring a video game to life. As mentioned above, FIFA 22 brings in “HyperMotion Technology” which enables the “most responsive and accurate artificial intelligence ever seen in a sports game.” Put simply, as a player or coach you can make substitutions, change tactics on the fly, and change formations – all of which can change the game completely on the fly. Football is unpredictable, and while it’s difficult to predict players switching games, or even tackling a player who’s not expecting the ball, the addition of the new HyperMotion System means you’re going to see it improve dramatically. In FIFA 22, it won’t be a one or two-man-show like it was before. FIFA 22 introduces “HyperMotion Technology,” which uses motion capture data from real players in a high-intensity match to create player models and to power FIFA 22 gameplay. This is a major step forward for FIFA, which has traditionally been criticized for its visuals, due to the lack of detail it was able to achieve. The new technology should be able to create better-looking graphics as well as better AI. Here’s what new FIFA player model looks like: This new technology uses data from thousands of high-intensity motion capture data. The motion capture data allows the player to animate on-ball and off-ball actions, all while maintaining the integrity and quality of a real-life match. This game is also the most realistic-looking game to date, in part because of the new physics, new lighting, new environment, new backdrops and new player models, which feature “28 new
