Gluteal Massage and Wellness

The gluteus maximus is a massive muscle that, if full of healthy fuel, can provide a runner or cyclist with the strength and power that will propel them forward and through the run, or along the terrain. (Excuse the puns, people...). This muscle serves to lift the body, to walk, to dance, and to play. This muscle is also a very popular muscle used in massage for athletes, often with the aim of moving excess weight from the back and buttocks. As well as the head of this muscle being fatty, quite thick, and quite hard, most people also have a calf muscle (i.e. the calf), which can be quite tender and tender in those with a history of calf strain and a general lack of aerobic conditioning. The gluteal area needs to be treated from a different angle to the upper back or the quads, in order to work effectively. Using the traditional contouring techniques of the upper gluteal area will not be very effective in terms of working the gluteal area, as it is a very large and rounded muscle, which is easily filled up by the upper body. There is a need to work the lower gluteal area first, then work the upper gluteal area, as it is most effective at working through the contraction of the gluteal muscles. From an upper back perspective, the aim is to move any tension created in the upper back from the hip, as the back will respond in much the same way that the gluteal muscles do. By being firm and tight, the issue will resolve. By applying a cross-axis technique, the hips are taken advantage of in order to create a contraction in the gluteal area.
