Today I've discovered that (see bolded section below) TypeId() == Type.GetType("System.Int32") is false, but Type.GetType("System.Int32") == TypeId() is true. Why is the former faster than the latter? Why it is (if I'm not wrong) based on type name? Why it is not the case for all types? A: Why is the former faster than the latter? TypeId is called from a place where it only has to get the type name. Why it is (if I'm not wrong) based on type name? It is based on the type name, and Type.GetType is written to assume you're looking for one type in particular. Why it is not the case for all types? A best guess would be that the implementation of TypeId is clever enough to avoid checking any more than the type name, which is the most important piece of information. If you want to compare the type of a variable, it probably has to get the type name anyway. A: To answer the first two questions you need to understand, what TypeId is good for. The purpose of TypeId is: "What TypeId is for". Thus far, it is a unique identifier for a type. For class types: The type identifier is used internally and is not accessible to the program. Thus, it will not be possible to call Type.GetType(TypeId);. So for class types the type name is enough. For value types: Value types contain a lot of meta data, for example they specify the number of bytes it takes, how they are laid out on 1cdb36666d
