The pattern of phosphorylation of cytosolic proteins and subcellular distribution of cyclic AMP-dependent protein kinase (cAMP-PK) in Xenopus oocytes in response to glucose and insulin was investigated. The enrichment of cAMP-PK in the nuclear membrane was observed in oocytes stimulated by glucose in vitro. In contrast to isolated nuclei, the kinase was not concentrated in the nuclear envelope but was distributed throughout the nuclear matrix. Phosphorylation of proteins which migrate as 0.5-1.5 S, is 0.7-1.8 S and 1.0-1.5 S was increased in the nuclear membrane fraction of oocytes stimulated by glucose in vitro. On the other hand, glucose induced a translocation of cAMP-PK from the nucleus to the cytoplasm and the Golgi complex in oocytes. This result was supported by the evidence that the signal responsible for the preferential increase of cAMP-PK activity in the nuclear membrane fraction was found in the vesicles isolated from oocytes stimulated by glucose in vitro.)
