Download Published Author(s) Metadata Abstract One of the challenges of researching qualitative data gathered through interviews, focus groups, and other qualitative research methods is reproducing the findings of a study. There are a number of different tools, guidelines, and nomenclatures available to assist the researcher in this process. However, if the researcher wishes to replicate the findings, there are different possibilities that can be used, and these are varied, with no clear winner. This study aims to explore the different possibilities and possibilities that are required in order for a researcher to replicate qualitative studies. The analysis, drawing on the classic text of qualitative research methods by Adler and Leyden, revealed a new model of qualitative data analysis. One of the main strengths of this model is that it adopts a holistic approach to data analysis. Further research needs to explore whether this new model can be used in other areas of qualitative research and to find out whether the data fit the model as developed in this study.Men who drink green tea, whether in capsule form or as a liquid, are 20 percent less likely to develop prostate cancer than men who drink no green tea, according to the results of a new study. More studies are needed, but the findings are “promising,” says study author Peter B. Jenks, Ph.D., of the National Cancer Institute in Bethesda, Md. As research continues into tea's cancer-fighting properties, scientists are learning that the compound found in green tea helps to regulate a number of processes that can lead to cancer. In the most well-understood of these, green tea has been found to increase the level of an enzyme
