Main Menu: Home:Antibiotic-resistant "superbugs" have invaded hospitals around the world and are becoming increasingly difficult to treat, causing untold misery, medical experts have warned. In a survey of 1,200 doctors by the British medical journal The Lancet, they warned that resistance to antimicrobial drugs, such as cephalosporins and quinolones, has reached a "critical level" and is fuelling a global "superbug" crisis. More than a third of doctors in the survey, published today, said the combination of increasingly antibiotic-resistant bacteria, as well as contaminated water, meat and milk supplies, was having an impact on the quality of life. "The evidence on antimicrobial resistance is clear: antibiotics are important, but not the only important aspect of the management of community-acquired pneumonia (CAP)," the authors write. "We are extremely concerned about the speed of the rise of antimicrobial resistance and the consequences it could have for patients with severe bacterial infections." The authors argue that the speed of the rise of resistance shows a failure of international control mechanisms, which they say was exacerbated by pressures on the pharmaceutical industry to constantly develop new antibiotics. They say resistance is growing in bacteria that are important in everyday life, including E coli, salmonella, enterococcus and the germ Staphylococcus aureus, which causes infections such as pneumonia and bloodstream infections. They estimate that 12,000 people in the UK die from resistant bacteria each year. "Antibiotic resistance is increasing across the world and its consequences are very severe, and we expect it to be associated with more disease, more fatalities, and also an increase in the direct and indirect costs of antibiotic resistance to health systems in the coming years," said Dr Tony Leon, professor of infectious diseases at the University of Leicester and chief author of the report. "Doctors can and should do much more to combat the spread of antimicrobial resistance. Governments have to listen to patients and patients' doctors, listen to the scientific evidence, and ensure we have a strong regulatory system that will work." Sir Malcolm Grant, professor of respiratory infection at Imperial College London, agreed that the rise in resistance was extremely worrying. "Bacteria are now getting increasingly hard to treat, and we are reaching a critical point. We are now right back to those times when infections were almost invariably lethal," he said.
