I have a list of lists in the form list = [[A, [B, C]]] The output I'm expecting is A, B, C A, B I've tried building a list of lists and then counting each index of the tree traversal, but I'm not getting the output i'm expecting. Any suggestions? This is the code that I've written thus far

def convert(tree):
    print('A') my_tree = [A for A in tree]
    for n in tree[0]:
        print(n)
        my_tree.append(n)
    print('B')
    return my_tree
```

A: You have to keep track of the depth of the recursion you are doing. When you reach a leaf level, it should be returning the last element of that list, and then only add the next element to a new list. def convert(tree): print('A') my_tree = [A for A in tree] for n in tree[0]:

    depth_of_current_level 1cdb36666d

In a village somewhere in Rajasthan, a family lives as the boys grow up, but the father and mother get into a feud for the first time. Global drought is upon us in a way never before seen, and this has a very real effect on people, crops and even property. Here are some recent statistics on the effects of drought in the UK. As well as the nutritional, environmental and economic cost of food shortages, drought can have a significant impact on individuals. Of course, we have the human tragedy of people suffering and dying when the natural environment doesn't provide the conditions to sustain their natural life. I have heard of recent large-scale flooding in the UK in the South-East, and of climate change generally. In many cases, we ignore the fact that a single storm now is powerful enough to be called a 'typhoon'! That is not to say that there are not other climatic factors contributing to global warming. What we are doing with our burning of fossil fuels is simply adding extra heat to the system, and there is now global agreement of the danger of this, even if our governments are bickering over who should bear the cost. We are all paying for the effect of the oil companies and carbon-dioxide polluters that we are all sharing in an inevitable expense for the future, and no one escapes the direct costs that are being created right now in the UK. Drought is not the only factor for which we are responsible. Soil erosion has a direct impact on our ability to grow food, and we all need to take responsibility for what happens in our immediate environment. There is a direct link between environmental pollution and this. I well remember when I first drove into my daughter's city for the first time. The air was unbreathable, the noise of traffic in the city almost deafening, and there was a constant stench from the factories and the exhaust fumes. All these conditions were caused by other people's disregard for the natural environment, and it showed in what we were allowing to happen. Many such examples can be cited. We are responsible for how we treat our rivers and our lakes, and unless we, the people, take responsibility for the other effects of an changing climate, that river will simply dry up and the lake
