Bounders and Cads is set in the fictitious town of Brokeville, governed by the benevolent dictator of Brokeville, the Brigadier. Brokeville is a small prosperous village, making a living on the back of honest hard work. A local eccentric has left his entire fortune of over a million pounds to be claimed by the "one who can play the dirtiest tricks and earn the most money in business dealings". The title is held in a sealed envelope, wrapped in a monocle and stuffed in Aunt Ednas' coffin. As well as being the sole executor of Aunt Ednas will, the Brigadier is also the chief of police. He is a kindly man who enjoys a game of bridge, has a bee-like bald head, and would be happy to give his left leg for a ferry ticket to the other side of the river. The game pits a cad (characters are named after the characters in the board game Monopoly) against a bounder. The protagonist must play the dirtiest tricks and pull the most money out of the enemy. The player's goal is to defeat the antagonist and claim the fortune. A healthy dose of luck is essential, however, as too many unlucky events may mean the protagonist fails to collect the fortune. Play and develop your character by purchasing businesses and sending out their staff. To support your business youll need to have people working on your behalf. Always work in a team to accomplish a task. Try to outwit and trick your opponents by blocking their businesses so they can only produce lower quality goods. Brokeville requires a reliable source of low cost goods to function as a small town. You can gain an advantage by keeping stores full of cheap goods and surprise your opponents by changing a business plan when they least expect it. As the plot unfolds so do the businesses, making the town into a living map. Who will you bribe to place your businesses? by Gabriel A. Herrera Kitaria swiveled her laptop around in response to Nicholas' question. The wind, she told him, when it's moving through a forest or open spaces, is much more noticeable than at sea. Trees and leaves, like children, block the wind from reaching the ground and slowing the expanse of ocean that surrounds them. At sea, wind can be heard, even in the slightest breeze, like a smooth cut directly across the middle of a delicately plucked oboe. "It's a tune I haven't gotten to yet," she told him. "Mr. Bentley isn't usually as open to new members as I am, but I made an exception for you." She pointed to the Wavesong machine that no longer skipped from side to side or made the flapping sounds of her previous score. "I've seen a few of the songs you wrote, and I appreciate that," said Nicholas. "Thank you." They were silent a few moments. The sun was beginning to hit them in the eyes. "Do you have any plans for today?" Kitaria looked behind Nicholas and saw a woman standing about ten meters away, in the direction of her mother's cabin. She was leaning against a large cherry tree with a bright red and white ribbon tied around its branches. "As a matter of fact, I do. This is Elsa, the local archaeologist. Elsa, this is Nicholas," she said. "Hi," said Nicholas. "Hello," said Elsa. They watched as Kitaria kissed her mother on the cheek and said a quick goodbye. It's ages since we've seen each other Kitaria thought to herself. She could see Kitaria's back as she walked away. Just a few hours, and already they've begun. She tried to hide her feelings but a smile crept onto her lips. "Are you drinking that soda, Nicholas?" Kitaria looked behind Nicholas to see a blue truck parked on the grass. An older man got out of the truck and walked to her right. He wore red plaid pants and a white shirt. Kitaria hadn't seen him since the day she entered the woods. "I thought you'd left," she said. The man smiled at her. "I ran into Kitaria's mother on the street the other day. She asked me to stop by
