The legislation is an important step in reducing the power that organisations such as Google and Facebook have over our data, and the EU is the first global organisation to have such wide-reaching privacy rules. But online giants will not have to change their business models immediately. Data Transfer Directive, which will come into force in February 2018, will leave it until then for companies to decide if they will allow users' information to be transferred from the EU to the US. But based on the EU's rules and the way these are set to be implemented in the UK, the London Datastore - an English data-transfer oversight body - is likely to play a key role in ensuring large companies comply with the law. We expect the amount of personal data that companies collect, as well as the way they use their customers' information, to be key areas where scrutiny will be carried out. That, in turn, will impact the UK's data economy. Current EU rules were written by a narrow committee of politicians and the group currently has no formal role in data protection. This means it has no expertise in the area and there is no independent oversight of the groups that meet. We'd like to see an independent data protection authority, and the increased powers that go with it. It's not just online giants who will benefit from the new measures: they will also apply to app and service providers. We expect the EU to force companies to disclose more information about how
