Abstract: In March 2017, I was invited to speak at the 300th anniversary of the University of Glasgow. One of the key events of the year, The Footsteps of Leadership and Times of Change was a colloquium hosted by the University's Commission for Leadership in the 21st Century. It brought together some 100 leaders from across campus to discuss 'unpacking leadership'. The project team of Dr Christine Nadin and Professor Brendan Small was tasked with investigating this by drawing together eight exemplars from the university's history. This was therefore a dialogue with our past, helping to ground the study in the present. I want to bring the focus back to the present day, and engage in a conversation with the themes that are being played out today. This is a point in time where universities are once again being challenged to become not just places of education, but also a place where the emancipatory potential of the university can be drawn out. As a public actor, what place does Glasgow University have in society today? The issue of diversity, diversity funding and the focus on student experience - have these been missed opportunities for the university to be a 6d1f23a050
