Conclusion For An Essay On Ww1

World War i was a war for many reasons. Most people today believe that it was for food, freedom and health care. However, this is only what the war is for on the surface. In reality, for Russia, the end of the war was actually the beginning of the end. World War i was a great conflict, and the world has never really been the same since. However, there were several reasons why this war occurred, and many reasons why it ended the way it did. The beginning of the twentieth century was inauspicious; it started off with a brutal German invasion of Belgium. After this, the war pretty much started to snowball, and by the summer of 1914, it seemed as if an agreement for a cease fire between Germany and Russia had been reached. It was a very short stay; by the end of October, neither side had made any significant gains, and it was agreed that a third party peace conference would be held to try to settle the war. The conclusion of the peace conference was that all of the issues of the dispute would be settled through arbitration. Finally, at the end of the war, Germany was to give up most of her rights, and Russia was to be given a few small parts of Europe, and it seemed as if the dispute was a forgone conclusion. However, Russia had plans for expansion and succeeded in taking what she wanted, and by the end of 1915 the Germans were forced into a truce after the British and French united to invade East Prussia, losing a staggering number of men in the process. The main cause of the war, both for Germany and for Russia, was the fear that they would be stopped from expanding their empires in Europe. One of the chief causes of WW1 was nationalism. Before 1914, Europe was divided between the Russian Empire and France, the Hapsburg Empire and Austria, Spain and Italy, Germany and the smaller states, and the United Kingdom. When the war began in 1914, there were differences between countries. People in Russia and Germany wanted independence for their nations. Everyone, including the nations where the war occurred, wanted what was best for their nation. They wanted to be strong and independent, and they wanted to have their own way of life, and that was their biggest problem. Nationalism was a cause of WW1. President Woodrow Wilson, the leader of the U.S. declared himself in support of the Allies. One of the reasons why the United States was
