[Video Link].The Gram-negative bacterium Pseudomonas aeruginosa is an opportunistic human pathogen that infects the lung and is the most common cause of morbidity and mortality in burn patients. This bacterium has also been implicated in a variety of other infections including urinary tract and soft-tissue infections, and pneumonia. P. aeruginosa uses a battery of mechanisms for colonizing and infecting the lung including the production of Type III secretion proteins (TTSS), which inject toxin into host cells and can also be injected directly into the cytoplasm of human lung epithelial cells;TTSS-independent mechanisms;and attachment to lung epithelial cells through various surface structures (LPS, Pel, Alg). A key virulence factor is the type III secretion system, which secretes a diverse set of cytotoxic proteins into host cells. These proteins are essential for the infection process in vitro and are required for P. aeruginosa virulence in mammalian and Drosophila infection models. It has been suggested that the Type III secretion system and its associated protein substrates are designed for targeting host cells. The substrate specificity of the type III secretion system remains unknown, although the proteins secreted by the type III secretion apparatus are expected to recognize their host targets. My long-term goal is to elucidate the molecular mechanism of type III secretion, and to use this knowledge to develop new anti-virulence strategies. The goal of the proposed research is to identify the host cell targets for the type III secretion system and TTSS-independent proteins in epithelial cells. The proposed research will identify new host cell substrates for the type III secretion system and TTSS-independent mechanisms, which will help elucidate the molecular targets of these virulence factors and provide new opportunities for development of new anti-virulence strategies against P. aeruginosa.Genetic susceptibility to the development of human immunodeficiency virus disease. There are two large potential sources of genetic susceptibility to the development of human immunodeficiency

No. 6,504,998, entitled "Video-Based Training and Monitoring System for Remote Patient Care" and issued Jan. 7, 2003, to D. K. Gordon et al. discloses an interactive video-based system for remote monitoring and training a care-giver of a remote patient. A central control unit interacts with one or more sensors associated with the patient. The sensors may include one or more physiologic sensors. The sensors are coupled to the central control unit, which may comprise one or more processors. The processor transmits the patient's physiological data to a remote server, which then transmits the data to a remote server, which then transmits the data to a video-based training and monitoring system, which displays the patient data to the care-giver for review. The system thereby provides for patient monitoring without a need for a physician or nurse to physically view the patient data. The remote server may include one or more databases for storing patient information, such as diagnosis, medication records, event details, 6d1f23a050
