H2 generation in an electrochemical cell using light-driven water photooxidation on a semiconductor surface is demonstrated by using an ion-sensitive field-effect transistor (ISFET) as an electrochemical sensor. The light-driven H2 generation occurs via UV light (330 nm) absorption from the semiconductor surface, which releases electrons and holes into the electrolyte, where these reoxidize water to form molecular H2. Water photooxidation on the semiconductor surface at the air-electrolyte interface is carried out in a micro-sized flow-cell assembled on the ISFET, thus enabling the optical detection of H2 generation. The developed device allows for real-time detection, and the H2 generation signal can be enhanced further by the increased charge transfer from the semiconductor surface to the electrolyte under illumination. The results indicate that the proposed ISFET-based light-driven H2 generation system is a promising strategy for optical sensing of low-volume gas
