This invention relates to the dehydrogenation of cyclohexanone to cyclohexene and more particularly, relates to the catalytic dehydrogenation of cyclohexanone at relatively low temperature to provide a substantially pure cyclohexene stream. Cyclohexene is used in the preparation of nylon-4,6, and is a starting material in the preparation of dicyclopentadiene. The polymeric compound produced from dicyclopentadiene is used for the formation of poly(1-butene) which is useful in the production of polybutylene terephthalate, poly(ethylene terephthalate), and for the preparation of multifilament and monofilament yarns. In the prior art, the two-step process for dehydrogenation of cyclohexanone comprises the catalytic treatment of a feed containing cyclohexanone in the presence of a dehydrogenation catalyst to obtain a dehydrogenation reaction product stream containing predominantly cyclohexene in the vapor phase and a liquid phase. The dehydrogenation reaction product stream is then subjected to a separation procedure to recover the substantially pure cyclohexene. In the prior art, cyclohexanone is conventionally dehydrogenated over a noble metal on a silica-alumina base catalyst to obtain cyclohexene in the vapor phase and a liquid phase. The vapor phase products obtained during the dehydrogenation of cyclohexanone are generally fed to a separation vessel and mixed with the liquid phase. The liquid phase is fractionated in a distillation column to obtain a distillate fraction comprising cyclohexanone and a raffinate fraction containing the cyclohexene. The cyclohexanone concentration in the raffinate
