Severe aplastic anemia is a life-threatening hematologic disease characterized by pancytopenia, hypocellular bone marrow, and hypoplastic hemopoiesis in the absence of myelodysplastic syndrome or myeloproliferative disease. Treatment with antithymocyte globulin (ATG) and immunosuppressive drugs have demonstrated some success in adults; however, there is a need for new targeted therapies. Recently, the use of dendritic cells for immunotherapy in patients with severe aplastic anemia has been reported, but the efficacy of this approach has yet to be established. Recently, a patient with severe aplastic anemia was successfully treated with a combination of high-dose cyclosporin A and dendritic cells, and no hematopoietic cell transplantation was required. This case report provides insight into the safety of dendritic cell therapy in a patient with severe aplastic anemia and a review of the current status of this emerging treatment.
