The detector has a sensitivity characteristic at the preselected frequency. If a metal target is present, the detected magnetic field at the preselected frequency will be a maximum when the metal target is positioned at a predetermined depth under the surface of the ground. Conventional coil-type metal detectors include a search coil which is a loop of conductive wire wound around a ferrous core. Because the magnetic flux lines generated by the coil-type metal detector are closed loops, the magnitude of the magnetic field strength generated by such a metal detector is a maximum in the area of the center of the loop. It is the flux that penetrates the earth near the center of the coil that exerts the primary influence upon the measured field strength. This point is illustrated in U.S. Pat. No. 3,567,134, which discloses an underground metal detector of the coil-type. This patent also discloses a technique of measuring the field strength in a constant raster scan pattern around a given compass point. This method is not only time consuming, it is not particularly well suited to use with a coil-type metal detector having a fixed search coil. Therefore, there is a need for a metal detector having a fixed search coil that is capable of pinpointing the location of a metal target in an underground location to within a predetermined accuracy. The present invention is directed to a method for pinpointing the location of a metal target in an underground location using a coil-type metal detector that has a main search coil and a secondary search coil. The first coil is used to scan a given area in a first preselected direction, to detect the presence of a metal target in the area. A second scan is then made in a second preselected direction, which may be the same or different from the first preselected direction. 6d1f23a050
