More particularly this invention relates to the generation of laser beams by means of photoluminescence by excitation by external beams. Lasers based on semiconductor materials have undergone rapid development during the past few years. Applications are presently found in several technological fields, including the packaging of semi-conductor chips and devices. In particular, laser sources have been obtained from semiconductor materials, in which the following phenomena have been observed: either the quantum confined resonant energy state is followed by radiative recombination or, in the case of stimulated excitation, laser emission occurs with a coherence corresponding to that of the exciting beam. The use of these phenomena has been made for modulating a carrier current, so that the laser source can be used as a laser modulator. The use of semiconductor materials for laser sources is also known, in particular, from U.S. Pat. Nos.

4,356,691 and 4,351,253. A known drawback to the use of semiconductor laser sources is that the operating wavelength is limited to a maximum value of about 1100 nm.This is my first Anilox plate. I had experience with IPG plates so I knew the usual problems one can encounter with Anilox as the Anilox matt "sucks". I knew that there is no coating on the surface of the Anilox and it's just a pure silicon stone. So I picked up 200 x 125 mtr Anilox from a local supplier (second hand) with no experience. I took it home hoping to use it as an ink plate. I cleaned it up mechanically but couldn't go much because my Anilox is not "damp proof" and the more water it got the worse it got. After that I would clean it up and it would be wet the next day. I also tried a few Anilox inks, which normally
